Boller Explosions. [From the Pittsburgh Dispatch.]
It is to be regretted that the experiments of Government boiler-testers, commenced in this city two years ago and never finished, had not been carried to a conclusion. It will be remembered that all efforts of the experimenters failed to explode a boiler or collapse a flue, notwithstanding the fact that the pressure was raised to such a degree as to render the gauges useless, those instru-ments not having been designed for such severe tests. Yet with all this force the most disastrous consequence reached was the forcing of steam out through the seams of the riveted plates. The efforts to burst the boilers were futile, although the tests were most severe, and greater preparation had been made for fying fragments than at the famous Hell-Gate explosion in New York a few days since. Those experiments were never completed, and in that respect may be said to have been unsatisfactory, but if anything at all were developed or indicated, it was that good boilers can scarcely ha exploded by fire and water. Yet on every occasion of accidental explosion there is an abundance of testimony to be had that one minute or one second previous to the explosion the water was up to the second cock and the steam gauge registered less pressure than the inspector's permit authorized the engineer to carry.

As a rule new boilers do not explode if made of first-class from or steel, and yet on the occasion of an explosion it is at once explained that the boiler was safe, and had been considered so for years. Generally boilers decay in spots, but after being patched are reported "as good as ever," and they are kept at work and subjected to the same pressure which they have borne for years. The inspector passes along tapping oc 21 the iron with his little hammer, all is pronounced safe, and so it goes till the explosion, which nobody can account for. The very idea that boilers require patching at frequent and more frequent intervals as they grow older would indicate, to any person not subjected to danger from them, general decay. But the owner of the works where the powerful engine is employed and the firemen and engineers go about the masked battery as if they were at work beside a bottle of soothing syrup. Cases are frequent and well-attested where boilers have been kept in use till a man might punch his fist through the shell as through the rind of a rotten pumpkin, and yet no explosion occurred. Old boilers have been turned out of service when blistered and rusted to such a degree as to become objects of curiosity, and yet they did not objects of curiosity, and yet they did not explode. In fact, with all the information that may be obtained on the subject of steam-boilers and explosions, the wonder is that so few calamities occur from the cause under consideration; and the unavoidable under consideration; and the unavoidable inference is that the prevailing method of inspection is inefficient, and needs to be made more thorough and exacting. Among people who are most employed about these dangerous machines there is a prevailing belief or faith that so long as a boiler does not explode it is safe; which doctrine lacks the basis of reason, for there might be illustrations offered to demonstrate that a steamboiler is never safe until it is exploded. The present system of life assurance is conducted on principles of percentage that from youth to age the changes of continued existence vary with each year, but no question seems to be raised by the inspector regarding the age of a steam-boiler. It may be burned by fire, rusted by water, strained by over-pressure, and yet as long as it presents its normal rounded appearance on the outside the inspector may pass it as readily or with more confidence than before it had ever had a fire built beneath it. Indeed a be burned by fire, rusted by water, strained steam-boiler seems to be one of the things which never grow old (till they kill somebody), and yet the domestic tea-kettle, or Monday's wash utensil with a fire under it once a week, achieves decay with wellknown and widely-deplored frequency. On the other hand, a steam-boiler which is subjected daily for twenty years to a pressure of 45 or 250 pounds to the square inch, is supposed to be safe as long as its plates are held together, although it may be patched and blistered entirely out of its original feature and complexion.

The common verdict that nobody is to blame for fatal boiler explosions has been flung into the faces of intelligent communities long enough. There is nothing mysterious about the nature of a boiler, constructed as it is on recognized scientific principles, and of material the composition and character of which are represented by figures as unmistakable as the marks on the dial of a chronometer; and when it explodes, it is either from present neglect or long usage and abuse. "Causes unknown" and "nobody to blame" have been endured at Charleston, S. C., last week. Many unacclimated persons have returned to Charleston within the vast few days, although the or weather is still w. um and there has been no
